deficiency--a case report. Factor X deficiency is a rare autosomal recessive disorder caused by a point mutation in the factor X gene (F.X). The disorder is characterised by defective factor X levels, prolonged prothrombin time, bleeding tendency and thrombotic complications. Its clinical presentation is quite variable and can be either mild or severe. We report a case of a 15-year-old male who had repeated nose bleed with positive finding for a factor IX deficiency initially. After investigation he was found to have a low factor X level with prolonged prothrombin time. He was diagnosed as having factor X deficiency after confirmatory tests. He was prescribed vitamin K, regular follow-up and correction of other deficiencies. His factor X level remained in the normal range during follow-up. Do you have any idea how many times a day we do this? Each time, it takes about 5 - 8 minutes. Then, we start all over again at the very beginning, until we've done every single thing in that bank account, from the most basic transactions to anything that we haven't done in a long time, like keeping a home renovation project or a car payment on schedule. Instead of wasting time, money, and energy at a point in our life where we probably have no intention of paying much attention to the amount of money in our accounts, we should be sitting down for a period of time to set up an account that serves that very purpose. Sit down for a couple of hours (probably best to do it in the evening, when you've got some time and energy for it) and start coming up with all the things you'd like to be able to have in your accounts. The more you think about it, the more you'll likely come up with.
